

Scale your learning programs and elevate L&D

Your learning program should positively impact the business—with the data to prove it. These tips will help you elevate your L&D practice to drive revenue, scale, and growth.

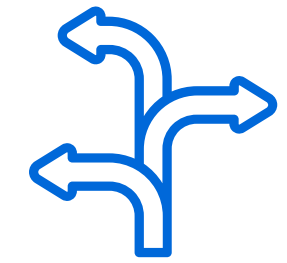

1

Invest in your learning technology

As a business grows, it's likely to have many types of learners (employees, customers, partners), each with their own needs. Technology can help serve these audiences across a variety of contexts, including remote, hybrid, mobile, and in-person.

When evaluating new tools, focus on:

- ✓ A cloud-based LMS. This makes version control and content rollout easy, even across multiple countries and languages.
- ✓ Mobile functionality and learning in the flow of work to improve engagement.
- ✓ Building integrations between your learning system and other software to simplify processes and finally collect useful data.

Create personalized learner pathways

Not all learners need the same level of depth. For example, your dev, sales, and accounting teams might all need compliance training, but the particulars will differ greatly between them.

To scale effectively, you'll want to personalize your content by learner category and skill level, from simple intro courses to advanced programs featuring subject matter experts. But with AI, you can generate personalized learning plans and recommendations automatically. No manual work required.

3

Expand your content library

Creating a single hour of high-quality learning content can take dozens of hours and cost thousands of dollars. But neglecting your content library is even costlier.

AI can help by generating content quickly from business assets you already own (like slide decks and documents). Easier still, many learning platforms offer off-the-shelf content libraries for in-demand skills.

Finally, don't forget localization. We checked the records: In the history of business, a project manager has never said "the translations are finished early."

Grow your employees, customers, and partners. Grow your business. A scalable learning program can make it happen.
